

ANSWERS to Frequently Asked Questions

1. Why is drug-free messaging important for health care and behavioral health providers?

- A well-executed, research-based media campaign is an effective prevention and stigma reduction strategy. Just as knowledge is power, the lack of knowledge or reliance on misinformation can be misleading and harmful.
- An ongoing media campaign focuses attention on the problem of substance misuse and connects the dots to solutions with research-based facts.
- Broad-based messaging influences population-level change on perception of risk and adult disapproval. High perception of risk is a protective factor against substance use.
- The National Center on Substance Abuse Prevention (CSAP) lists media campaigns as a recommended strategy for information dissemination.
- Messaging elevates organizational visibility, which leads to higher-level collaborations.

2. How is the Prevention Accelerator different from other media campaigns?

Effective information dissemination advances understanding and knowledge of the nature and extent of substance misuse, addiction, treatment, recovery and stigma, and their effects on individuals, families and communities.

Ongoing messaging provided over a one-year timeframe raises awareness about these issues and provides real solutions (outlined below—see question #4). The Prevention Accelerator campaign aligns nicely with state and national campaigns that capture the attention of the public and draw people to their websites. Healthcare and behavioral health organizations are able to align their messaging with these state and federal campaigns and bring research-based content directly to their adult community on a weekly basis—thus empowering every adult in their community as a problem solver and putting everyone on the “same page.”

3. What are the solutions the Prevention Accelerator provides for the problems of youth substance misuse?

The Prevention Accelerator focuses on solutions by:

- Raising community awareness that addiction is a treatable disease when comprehensive strategies are implemented, and reduce stigma to provide treatment and recovery services.
- Branding--Increases public awareness that the health care provider is a regional prevention partner, providing local solutions for local problems.
- Providing parents with practical tools to build dialogue with their children about drugs/alcohol.
- Providing encouragement and inspiration to individuals suffering with substance use disorders, so they will feel empowered to seek treatment.
- Educating elected officials on the need for strong policy and funding of prevention, treatment and recovery programs.
- Providing additional resources for solutions to specific issues.
- Empowers individuals and communities to keep SOLUTIONS, not problems at the center of their attention and decision making.
